

Advantages and Disadvantages of Outsourcing for Small Business including Economics Risks and Employee Care

In a vibrant city of almost any size a small business shouldn't have to look very far to get good employees, actually there's probably one around every corner. However what does one do if that small business operates in a remote town or a small country village? Finding workers with specific skills suddenly becomes much harder. And even if you find them, can you guarantee that they will stay forever? What about small businesses that operate online? Often in that case the business tends to have clients outside of their local area or indeed their own country. It's hard to provide adequate customer service if you're asleep whilst your customers are awake. In these instances, finding international outsourcers makes perfect sense.

One of the greatest advantages of outsourcing is that your employees are not location dependent and are indeed geographically free. If there is small business importer with the majority of its clients in Thailand but you are in America, then it makes sense to find an outsourcer who not only is in the same time zone but it could be advantageous to find one who speaks the language. As the market place becomes more globalized and our methods of communication become more instant and technologically advanced, finding outsourcers whom can help your business achieve it's goals becomes even more important.

Back to the case of the small business operating in a small rural town, through outsourcing, that small business now has access to the best graphic designers on the planet to whom they could enlist to create effective media and advertising strategies on a national or even international scale. They could access the best in customer support, training, and IT services all online and from their computer. Also the small importer could enlist the services of local freelance sales people to ensure that they maintain a marketing foothold in the country. For someone who is creative and determined, outsourcing could be an entrepreneur's dream.

Since most freelancers work from home and provide their own equipment the need to build expensive branches of businesses can be eliminated and office meetings can take place via Skype or even using Goto Meetings software. This greatly reduces the startup capital needed to begin a profitable growing enterprise. This also means that for the first time in history it is now easier (and cheaper) than ever before to start an enterprise and to gather the best minds to move forward your endeavors.
