Sites such as Elance provide a much more elegant and simpler solution than manually looking up web pages and contacting graphic designers individually. It's a lot like shopping on EBay. Instead of going to different online stores to get things why not go to one place where you know millions of people are selling almost everything imaginable.

The greatest feature of sites like Elance and Freelancer is that on these sites, designers bid for your project, allowing you a chance to compare and select prices and skill sets that suit you best. It's like a reverse auctioning process. Instead of freelancers bidding ever-higher prices they will try to outbid each other by providing more and more competitive prices. This makes venturing to these sites a very cost effective and time efficient way to access the cream of the crop in terms of graphic designers.

Unlike many design agency websites, which can be found online, yet only offer offline services freelance artisans can give you visual solutions all online, making it easy to send and receive images and instructions.

Another great aspects of finding graphic designers online via sites such as Odesk are that the system runs on a trust system. As jobs get finished both project managers and outsourcers must provide feedback ensuring that a just feedback rating is delivered. Comments can tell a lot about how a person can operate and you can quickly weed out outsourcers whom you would prefer to not work with and outsourcers whom you would be happy to invite.
